- 1) (1) New York University's Leif D. Nelson and Tom Meyvis explored a surprising phenomenon in a 2008 study.
 - (2) The researchers recruited participants who were told they would be reviewing a massage cushion.
 - (3) Participants were split into two groups.
 - (4) The first group used the device for three minutes (180 seconds) without a break.
 - (5) The second group used the massage cushion for two periods of 80 seconds, with a 20-second break between sessions.
 - (6) Afterwards, participants were asked to rate their enjoyment of the massage on a nine-point scale (one = not pleasant; nine = extremely pleasant).
 - (7) Those who had a three-minute massage gave an average rating of 6.05 out of 9.
 - (8) However, those forced to take a 20-second break during their massage gave a rating of 7.05 — that's a 17% improvement in satisfaction.
 - (9) At first glance, that's counter-intuitive.
 - (10) The group who had the shorter massage enjoyed it more.
 - (11) But the theory is that the break in pleasure prevents us from becoming too familiar with the positive experience and thus noticing it less — a process called habituation.
